On digging amidst the rock, a cistern very curious on account of its stalactites has been discovered on the northern side; and in another place, a well sixty feet in depth, at the bottom of which in a reddish chalky gravel were some petrised bones: some of these, on being taken up, evidently appeared to have belonged to human bodies. Pedants, who pretend to know every thing, fay, that in order to six the epoch of the petrifaction of these bones, we are only to go back to the eighth century, that is to fay, to the period when the Moors passed over to this continent. Philosophers, however, are unable to come to any decision on the subject. St. Michaels cavern is well deserving of attention: it 19 extremely spacious; and its depth, which is upwards of one thousand feet, much exceeds that of Antiparos, according to Mr. F, who has seen them both. The entrance into this grotto is near the summit of the rock: these places formerly were extremely steep; but at present the way up is by small well beaten-paths. We descended into it by the help of a cord, cord, to prevent us from flipping; for the slope is very steep j and passing between two pillars into a saloon eighty feet high, the ground of which presents a magnisicent spectacle, we came into a sort of Gothic theatre, adorned with columns and curtains, and hung round with festoons. To observe it...
