Excerpt from Patent Pointers: Or, How to Obtain Patents Through the Scientific Agency It may be set down as a universal rule of action with men in civilized communities, (the exceptions being very few comparatively), that when one needs some service in a calling other than his own, he seeks the aid of some person trained and skilled in the calling to which the needed service pertains. If he be sick, he calls in the best medical talent available. If his rights, either of person or property, be threatened, he seeks the aid of what he considers to be the best legal talent for their protection. And, as in these days, the wide fields of medicine and law are divided into special fields, each occupied by specialists, each of whom devotes his whole time, ability and skill to his specialty, for instance, in medicine one practitioner being devoted to diseases of the eye, another making a specialty of the nerves, another devoted entirely to the study of the lungs and so on; while in law one counsellor...
